It is now evident that England is duly sensible of the interests she has at stake in the preservation of peace with this country, and as she has exhibited the independence of following he substantial interests in opposition to the prompt ings of popular feeling, it becomes us in any future negotiations to act with a becoming mag-nanimity. The honor and neutral integrity of this country has been fully vindicated, and to us at the South at least, it is of the very last importance that no unnecessary collision shall occur. We raise the staples of which England is the market, and it will not advance prosperity to close her ports, and rely upon the markets of the north for consumption; the glory to be acquired by the arms of this country in a foreign war, will greatly strengthen the arms of the General Government, and as the power of the General Government has now become a stake for which both sections play, while the North has very much the largest hands of trumphs, we have every reason for not letting the stake get larger until the game shall be decided. We have hesitated, from considerations of national regard, to speak from a local point of view with respect to the questions pending between the two Governments; we were unwilling to increase the difficulties of agreement by an exhibition of a divided council, but since the difficulty is happily over, we hope that the South will ever come up to such emergencies with a due sense of its true interest with respect to them, and remember ever, that while we have a common government, we have also a particular social existence to be preserved, and that it is not the whole of patriotism to seek for too wide a range of national advancement.-Charleston Standard
